

When we develop mastery, we ought to acquire component skills, practice integrating them and know when to apply what we have learned.

We acquire our component skills, the theory to driving, in the classroom, both with independent study and group work tasks.

We then practice integrating theory to practice, our driving knowledge, in a safe learning environment where it's okay to take risks and make mistakes so we can learn and correct ourselves.

And finally, we can apply what we learn in real-life situations; that is, the road, and our drivers education does not stop after our lessons, but as long as we continue to drive, we are always learning.

This is a great analogy for anything we learn in our classrooms.